Title: Collaborative Instruction: Top Five Tips for Maximizing Student-Learning

What is collaborative instruction? Where/Why is it happening at Mason? This session will introduce participants to different models of collaborative instruction, including co-teaching, TA-supported, and language-supported approaches. Discussion leaders will present a range of instructional methods from blended to supplemented instruction in order to provide tips on how to plan, implement and assess classroom teaching and learning for diverse populations.

More about the Center for International Student Access (CISA)

Founded in 2010, CISA has grown into a resource center for international students in the undergraduate ACCESS Program & graduate BRIDGE Program as they transition into the university community during their first year.

CISA is committed to creating a supportive, culturally inclusive learning environment to help our students to develop as global citizens and to be successful at Mason. Our students benefit from a variety of support services, including higher levels of academic advising, personal adjustment support, and academic English language tutoring, as needed. CISA also facilitates peer support programs that help our students to build confidence in their abilities both as students and as multilingual speakers of English.

More about the Center for Teaching Excellence (CTFE)

CTFE's mission is to provide leadership in promoting, supporting, and celebrating educational excellence. We pursue our mission through working with Mason faculty to enhance their skills as educators, as reflective practitioners in their disciplines, and as scholars in teaching, learning and research.

CTFE seeks to promote a climate of shared intellectual exploration and openness and to advocate for academic initiatives related to educational and faculty enhancement. CTFE collaborates with academic, academic support, administrative, and University Life offices to offer resources and support to faculty from across the Mason community at all stages of their academic careers, including graduate students, part-time faculty, and full-time faculty.
