REMEMBERING AND REIMAGINING IN THE MIDDLE AGES

The remembered afterlife of past events, distinct from the strictly historical particulars of the events themselves, represents a richly varied point of departure for understanding the cultures and history of the Middle Ages. Memory is always a dynamic process. It is a product of the present aimed at the past and a phenomenon at once personal and collective. Memory spans cultures, social strata, and time periods through the selective processes of remembering and reimagining. How did such processes of memory play out in the cultures of the medieval world? What events were deemed fit to remember and how were they reimagined? What was the medieval relationship between power/authority and memory/oblivion? How were medieval memories of the past shaped by texts, rituals, and material culture? How ought we, as scholars of the Middle Ages, remember or reimagine the medieval world? The Center for Medieval and Byzantine Studies at CUA invites graduate student medievalists from all institutions and disciplines to explore these questions and many others by presenting their research on the theme of ‘Medieval Memory’ in the form of 15-minute conference presentations (followed by 5 minutes of discussion).
